

Chris Cluff is a Canadian playwright, educator, and community-theatre artist based in Ontario. He writes character-driven work that blends humour and emotional honesty, often exploring memory, family dynamics, grief, and the quiet ways people try to stay connected. His plays frequently draw on everyday objects and pop-culture touchstones as emotional anchors, creating stories that feel intimate, accessible, and deeply human.

In addition to his work as a playwright, Chris is a seasoned secondary-school educator with training in Special Education, Student Success, and Guidance. His teaching practice centres on empathy, reflection, and helping young people find their voice. Deeply involved in community theatre, he works as an actor, director, and festival organizer, with a strong commitment to supporting first-time and emerging artists.

Chris's work values collaboration, curiosity, and care—on stage, in the classroom, and in the creative process. He lives and works in Newmarket.
